

In future, in the event of accidents resulting in death, prosecution of organizations for the offence of corporate manslaughter can not be ruled out. And where prosecutions are taken under health and safety law the enforcing authorities will also be looking to see if directors or senior managers can be prosecuted as well the organization. New guidance is being developed to set benchmarks for director leadership of health and safety.

No business, however outstanding, can afford to delay reviewing their corporate governance of health and safety. Directors need to be able to show that they have taken all reasonable steps to manage risks, and have effective health and safety management systems in place, including arrangements for involving their workforce.
